CHAPTER XVII The Woman s Plea Miss Brenton, said Whittaker with the deepest gravity he could infuse in voice and manner, you have been a most unfortunate, a most unhappy woman. Allow me to assure you of my sincerest commiseration, my deepest respect, my most profound admiration. You have suffered, but innocently. If I may speak the voice of society, if I may stand for the world, as your companion has said, I can only express my reverence for you and my homage to you in this way. He stepped nearer to her, he seized her hand. He was an old-fashioned, humble-minded, quixotic sort of a sailor, if you will, for before anybody realized what he was about, he bent his head low over it and kissed it. And the sailors behind him and the marines in rank broke into a hearty cheer. There, madam, said Whittaker, you have the approbation of society for my act. As for you, sir, he turned toward Langford, I should be untrue to my manhood if I did not say what you yourself have said; that you acted not only like a brute and a coward, but, sir, when I look at the lady, I am constrained to add like a fool. Langford started forward, but the lieutenant-commander checked him. Having said all that, I must admit that you have conducted yourself since that time as a man of honor and as a gentleman. I have no...
