Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Four Essays: The Science of Political Economy; Political Economy and Industry and Their Relations; Impolicy of Protective Duties; A Position of the Friends of the High Tariff Examined The pure mathematics is the only science, of which the subject matter seems susceptible of exact and rigorous definition. By whatever term we think proper to distinguish the knowledge of the properties of space and number, these properties, as well as the subject matter of them, must ever remain unchanged. It is true that properties, before unknown, may in the progress of the science be made known, and the sphere of science be thus enlarged; but the subject matter must ever be the same. In mathematics, we contemplate the properties of that being, (if I may so express myself,) which not only can undergo no change, but in which no change is conceivable, and which therefore is susceptible of the utmost exactness of definition. Nothing that we can form any idea of is like it, and as we cannot by any means conceive the idea of its being annihilated, it follows, that its existence is the necessary accompaniment, and, as it were, condition of all that we can think, or feel, or know. In all other sciences, the subject matter of examination, however durable (in the common acceptation) in its nature, is neither, so far as we know, immutable nor eternal; and can easily be conceived to be annihilated. We shall not enter into the question, whether matter itself can be conceived annihilated, still less into that, whether it exists at all, and is not a mere quality of mind: all that we affirm is, that...
