Excerpt: . . . ADDRESS. Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, President Leland Stanford Jr. University. This is an opportunity to go over a few points with you that interest me and perhaps they may interest you. I like to think, when I deal with a group of human beings, that man is a social animal and to compare his activities to those of a hive of bees or an ants nest to see in how far he is able to carry on his common functions as well as the social insects and animals do. It is simple to look over an ants nest, but not so simple to study a bees hive, but you find, when you begin to analyze their lives, that both have a certain definite program--food supply, housing, protection of the group, and discipline. They work it out. We call it instinct--the process by which they have learned to do the thing so well. They have the problem of protecting the group from enemies and they handle it very well. We are rather proud ourselves of the way our young men go off to fight, but there is no hesitancy on the part of the fighting bees or ants--they sacrifice themselves very willingly. We call that willingness and sacrifice patriotism, idealism and the sort of thing. Certainly you have to agree that the social insects have that very highly developed. In fact when it comes to protection, the bees have that down to a very fine...
